The fire started on the fourth floor
Miller, of No. 620 East One Hundred pled by E. B. Newman & Co., at No. run 620 West Twenty-fifth street. Workmen upset a portable furnace and hot coals falling on the debris covering the floor started the fire. In a few seconds the top floor rear was a mass of flames, and the workmen were forced to run from the building.

When the firemen arrived they found the flames licking the rear of the sixters half-like granted by lower Levis and the sixters half-like granted by lower Levis and the flames licking the rear of the sixters half-like granted by lower Levis and the flames licking the rear of the sixters half-like granted by lower Levis and the flames licking the rear of the sixters half-like granted by lower Levis and the flames licking the rear of the sixters half-like granted by lower Levis and the child. Miller gave his attention to the mother.

While Miller was getting in his good work some one telephoned for an ambulance. When the surgeon arrived he found that Ethel's back, face and hands were terribly burned and that Mrs. Weinstock's hands were in a bad way.

Both remained at home. Miller left the story building occupied by James J. Duffy, a contractor and liveryman, of No. 533 West Twenty-fourth street. Before the hose lines could be laid the top floor of the Duffy building was Sixty Horses Rescued.

There were sixty horses in the Duffy building, some on the fourth floor. Frightened by the smoke and crackling flames, the animals refused to budge. With the aid of moistened sacks thrown over their heads they were all finally led out of the building.

When Chief Croker arrived on the third alarm he saw that the Newman building was doomed, and devoted his attention to saving a part of the Duffy otructure and the adjacent buildings. "Now we'll see what the salt-water mains can do," he said.

The fire to-day was the first opportunity provided for their effective test. A few minutes after the connections were made, the Duffy building and its neighbors were being deluged, and Chief Croker said: "We wanted a hundred pounds pressure and we are getting it. If it wasn't for the new mains we couldn't save any part of the

The roof of the New York Metal Ceiling Company, next door to the Duffy Building, caught fire, but one switch of the high pressure stream from No. 3 hose tower saved the building. A lumber yard next door and the building of the Mutual Steam Laundry Company, on the other side, got a drenching in the nick of time.

Fireman's Narrow Escape.

In a futile attempt to save the New-man Building, Foreman McCue, of Engine Company No. 18, the first to respond to the alarm, led half a dozen men into the first floor. Thomas Leonard, the "nozzle man," was in the vanguard when a startled cry gave them warning of a back draught.
"I was between two fires," said Leonard, after he was revived. "If I let go of the nozzle it would have threshed around and probably crushed me, so I decided to take a chance with the back draught and hold on."
Leonard was overcome and hadiv singed when carried out of the building. He was attended by an arrival lance surgeon from the New York Hospital.

Chief Croker succeeded in saving the Chief Croker succeeded in saving the first three floors of the Duffy building. The Newman building, where the fire started, was completely gutted. "The test of the high pressure main to-day means that the downtown section of Manhattan is safe from fire," said Chief Croker. "With a reasonable start we can stop any fire. The newmans are a great success." mains are a great success."

The Newman firm estimated the damage done to stock and building at $65,-600. Contractor Doffy said 35,000 would cover his loss. cover his loss.
